Royal Doulton Character & Toby Jug Complete Listings

Version A.1

April 2020

Royal Doulton Character & Toby Jug Complete Listings compiles together in a single document all of the known production of Royal Doulton character jugs and toby jugs, reaching back to the Lambeth factory's stoneware production through the latest jugs released, including prototypes and colorways. Also included herein are comprehensive derivatives listings ranging from ash pots to teapots, bookends to wall masks, and more.

This e-book is a living document. It will be revised and re-issued periodically, incorporating updated information and expanding the knowledge of Royal Doulton character jugs, toby jugs and their derivatives through the generous contributions of the collecting community.

Origin & Development of the Figural Character Pitcher

The figural character pitcher is descended from a long line of anthropomorphic vessels from ancient times. Long before recorded history, images of living things were being made from clay. Archeologists have found evidence of pottery figures dating back to the Stone Age, and some think such figures were being made even before utilitarian earthenware pots and pitchers.

Pottery figures over 6,000 years old have been found in Egypt and figural pitchers over 4,000 years old have been discovered in Crete, home of the Ancient Minoan civilization. Numerous examples of ancient jugs, cups, pots and other vessels made in the likeness of humans, animals and mythical beings have been unearthed in Greece, Italy, and throughout the Roman Empire, including Great Britain. Over the same period, ancient Peruvian and other South American civilizations produced a wide range of hand molded figural jugs and vessels. In North America as well, many examples of jugs and bottles made in human likeness have been discovered.

Examples of ancient bottles and pouring vessels circa 4000-2000 BC

By the mid-1500s, small faïence pitchers in the form of a seated man or woman, called Jacquot and Jacqueline, became popular in France. These human shaped pitchers recall the romantic story of Jacqueline de Bavière, a courageous countess who escaped imprisonment by her cousin and arch rival to lead her troops and successfully preserve her heritable lands.

Jacquot and Jacqueline faïence pitchers

The next major development in figural pitchers was the first appearance of the ubiquitous 18th century English Toby jug. The first Toby creator is not conclusively known. Some date Toby's creation to around 1750, but most believe it to be slightly later, somewhere between 1760 and 1770. Various historians have bestowed the honor of being Toby's creator on one of several well known Staffordshire potters of the period, including John Astbury, Thomas Whieldon, Ralph and Aaron Wood, as well as John Voyez, an apprentice of both Josiah Wedgwood and Ralph Wood.

Virtually overnight the Toby Jug became a popular figure in homes and taverns throughout Staffordshire and all of England. With a tricorne hat that was perfect for pouring, the primary purpose of the Toby Jug was as a beverage vessel, as was that of the Pots Jacqueline before him.

Production of the figural Toby Jug grew through the late 18th and early 19th century with the creation of a wide variety of characters and derivative forms, including being produced in the beautiful Victorian majolica finish that swept the world after the 1851 Crystal Palace Great Exhibition in London.

Royal Doulton was founded in 1815 by John Doulton in Lambeth, England. By 1926, Doulton & Watts as it was known then was one of the more important Lambeth potteries. Henry Doulton joined the firm soon after and was instrumental in driving exponential growth of the firm. Purchasing a Burslem factory in 1882, Doulton expanded operations to include bone china and decorative ware at the Burslem factory. In 1901 the company was granted the Royal Warrant, becoming Royal Doulton.

Production of character jugs and toby jugs by Doulton began in the Lambeth factory in the late 1880s with the production of several stoneware jugs including Admiral Lord Nelson and Toby XX, and which continued into the first quarter of the 1900s. Production of earthenware toby and character jugs at the Burslem factory can be dated to 1918 with the creation of the Charlie Chaplin toby jug. Charles Noke can be credited with the creation of Doulton's expansive character jug line which began in 1934 with the creation of the John Barleycorn and Old Charlie character jugs.

Royal Doulton continued introducing new character and toby jugs up until 2011 when the company's fortunes took a turn for the worse and production was drastically scaled back and limited. Much to the dismay of collectors worldwide, the authors know of no plans for Royal Doulton to resume production of its character jug and toby jug lines.

About the Authors

Steve Mullins was a graduate of Dartmouth College and the University of Michigan Business School and was Chairman of a Chicago based real estate investment firm. He started collecting Toby and Character jugs as a teenager seventy years ago. Today the collection numbers over 8,300 jugs from around the world, dating from those earliest produced in the 1760s to the latest 21st Century ones. The collection is now on display in the American Toby Jug Museum in Evanston, Illinois.

David Fastenau is a graduate Engineer from Iowa State University and Santa Clara University Leavey School of Business, and is currently semi-retired on Kauai with his wife, Michelle. David's collecting passion for figural pitchers and Toby jugs was spurred when he inherited a small collection of Royal Doulton Character and Toby jugs from his grandmother. His collection continues to grow and now numbers over 800 full bodied figural pitchers and Toby jugs. Together, he and his wife have raised five children and were recently blessed with their second grandchild.

World War II Allied Leaders Toby Jug Collection

Released in 2017, the new Wilkinson World War II Allied Leaders Collection has been inspired by the original World War I Allied Commanders Toby Jug set designed by F. Carruthers Gould and produced by A. J. Wilkinson, Ltd. between 1915 and 1919. This iconic set of eleven jugs featured famous World War I statesmen and military leaders. Today, the pieces in this original series have become some of the most sought after toby jugs ever produced. The Wilkinson company's plans for a similar WWII collection was cancelled due to the demands of the war effort in Britain and the series was never created.

The American Toby Jug Museum in Evanston, Illinois, has brought this idea to fruition with a special commission of Toby jugs based on the greatest World War II military and political leaders. This collection was modeled by Ray Noble, one of England's most gifted and renowned modelers. Following the Wilkinson style, each new Toby is eleven inches tall and holds a symbolic artifact. Further iconic details and quotes are incorporated in the handle and base designs. The collection was produced in Staffordshire England by Bairstow Manor Pottery and each Toby jug is handcrafted and hand painted by master craftsmen.

Own a piece of history and add this historic series to your collection! Call 877-TOBYMUSEum to reserve your set or purchase individual jugs.

The American Toby Jug Museum

Showcasing the largest collection of toby and character jugs in the world. On display are over 8,300 pieces illustrating the evolution of the toby jug form from its inception around 1765 to the present day.

The centerpiece of the Museum includes more than 1,500 Royal Doulton Character Jugs, Toby Jugs, Derivatives and Colorways thereof. The highlight of the collection encompasses 150 plus rare and unique Doulton prototype jugs, never before brought together in one location.

A Century of Royal Doulton Character & Toby Jugs is a unique reference book in the collectives field. The most comprehensive book ever published on this 20th Century collecting phenomenon, it provides the most extensive information ever gathered together in a single volume. With an informative profile of every character, the text is lavishly illustrated with over 2,000 large color photographs of more than 1,300 separate jugs and derivatives, most of which never before have been compiled together in colored print.

Photographs of every Royal Doulton production jug and derivative of the past century produced to the date of publication are included, plus those of more than 100 prototype jugs, many of which will be new to the collector's eye.

The scope, details and pictorial abundance set this book apart from any other reference book on the subject.
